The stone house at Ravenwood Farm is a collection of three or four additions to an original stone farmhouse from the mid-nineteenth century. The result is roughly "L" shaped in plan, two storeys high with gable roofs with ridges along the legs of the L. Beginning at the west, there is a one storey kitchen addition with a half-hipped roof at the west wall of the "core"; next, is the original house, two storeys with a gable roof running north-south, four bays on the east and west (long) elevations and two bays on the gable ends, with two small square attic windows in the gables; next is a long wing, built in at least two sections, two storeys with an east-west gable roof. The north wall of all the sections is flush. The long additions at the east are narrower than the width of the original, yielding the "L" plan. Fenestration in general is 2/2. The interior of the house is a modern renovation. The contiguous grounds include several outbuildings, including a stone springhouse of some interest.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The small inner core of the current stone house at Ravenwood Farm is the original farmhouse. It has been severely altered to the point where its interior is now twentieth century. Aspects of its original Greek-revival character can be seen in its north elevation, particularly in the eave returns and the overall proportions. The stone work of the old part is very fine, particularly in relation to that of the later additions.

Ravenwood Farm House
Recommendations

Page 1

The stone farmhouse at Ravenwood farm is a scenic addition to the landscape and in very sound condition. The current occupants are of the ideal kind, willing to devote their own time and resources to maintaining the place, and every effort should be made to renew current lease arrangements and the DNR should, in its turn, provide for routine upkeep and maintenance.
